Debatable: Win points for winning arguments. This social game by Brass Monkey includes 200 game cards, each featuring opposing views of hot button issues...like how to load the dishwasher like an actual human being. Just pick a side, and debate it out. There's no politics, religion, or any of that crap here. There are way more important things to fight about. For example: Those brownie edge pieces are garbage. Go ahead, prove us wrong.

Players take turns playing the roles of dealer, debaters, and judges. When the dealer draws a card, judges secretly write their opinion of the statements on both sides of the card. Then the dealer holds the card in the air and drops it. The color of the side facing up determines the topic and the first debater to choose which opinion they'll argue for, leaving their opponent to defend the other position. Debate follows an argument-counterargument-rebuttal pattern starting with the first debater. Next, the second debater gets to choose which opinion from the second (facedown) argument they wish to defend, leaving the remaining opinion for their opponent to defend. The second debater starts, following the same debate pattern as before. Finally, each judge announces who they thought won the debate, as well as what they originally wrote down for their own opinion on the matter, for each topic. If a judge's opinion isn't changed, each debater gets a point, but if a debater manages to sway a judge to their argued point of view, that debater gets both points from that judge.
