Mark Twain in Buffalo, 1869-1871

Mark Twain only lived in Buffalo for two years, but it was a time of both great success and personal tragedy for Twain. His Innocents Abroad was becoming a bestseller, moving 30,000 copies in only a few months, but personal tragedies would force Twain to leave Buffalo by the Spring of 1871. Buffalo marked a turning point in his life. While here, he realized that he was a writer, not a journalist, and never looked back.

The Buffalo Express

In early 1869, Twain was engaged to Olivia Langdon, and had decided to purchase a share in a newspaper. After surveying papers in Cleveland and Hartford, he purchased a one-third share of the Buffalo Express, and was able to borrow half of the $25,000 sale price from his future-father-in-law, Jervis Langdon. Twain lived in a boarding house downtown, not far from where the library stands today. In the same house lived Grover Cleveland, who would later be elected Mayor of Buffalo, Governor of New York, and eventually 22nd and 24th President of the United States. Twain was writing regular columns for the Express, ranging from absurdist humor to human rights.

One such humorous piece was the cover of the Express on September 17, 1870. Twain spent two days carving out a “map” of the fortifications of Paris with a penknife at his desk. He neglected to draw it backwards to be printed properly, so it came out looking as though you’d need a mirror to read it. The geographic integrity of the map itself is just as compromised, as Jersey City can be found just west of the Seine, and the Erie Canal appears to be one of the great rivers of Paris. Twain drew this map as a response to the American news of the Franco-Prussian War, which had just begun to get coverage in the Express and many other papers. The map was printed in the Express to parody the barrage of information Americans received.

Mark Twain Lives Here

In February of 1870, Twain married Olivia Langdon in Elmira, New York. After the wedding the entire Langdon family went to Buffalo to celebrate. Twain believed they would be staying at a boarding house temporarily, as Twain had fairly modest means to support his new bride. Instead, after meandering all around the city, the carriage driver stopped in front of 472 Delaware Ave. It was their new home, a surprise gift from Olivia’s father Jervis. (An original mantel from their home decorates the back wall of the Mark Twain Room.) It is said that Twain hung a plaque outside the home reading “Mark Twain lives here and my father-in-law pays the rent.” At this point, Innocents Abroad, Twain’s satirical travel book, had become a bestseller, selling 30,000 copies in only a few months.

Shortly thereafter, tragedy slipped into Twain’s life. In the spring of 1870, Olivia’s father Langdon died. This hit the family especially hard, since Langdon had purchased the Clemens’ home, and loaned Twain half the money to purchase his share of the Express. In a terrible twist, a close friend staying with the Clemens’ in Buffalo to help Olivia recover from her loss, became ill and died only a few weeks later. Twain was devastated, and the fact that he needed to be funny in print for the newspaper only made this period of his life worse. In his last column at the Express, in April 1871, Twain wrote: “To be a pirate on a low salary and with no share of the profits in the business used to be my idea of an uncomfortable occupation, but I have other views now. To be a monthly humorist in a cheerless time is drearier.”

For Mr. C.M. Underhill

Twain left Buffalo in March of 1871, but would return to it in his books, contributing “The First Authentic Mention of Niagara Falls” to The Niagara Book in 1893. The book, published by Twain’s friend Charles Underhill, was a souvenir for visitors of the Falls. Twain’s piece was an excerpt from “Adam’s Diary,” a funny piece presupposing that Adam and Eve’s garden was found at Niagara Falls. The diary begins “This new creature with the long hair is a good deal in the way.”

When Twain wrote letters to Charles Underhill regarding publication, he could never trust himself to remember his Buffalo address, so instead he would try and narrow it down by giving particulars: “in the coal business” or “used to be handsome” or, better still, “a little bald on top of his head.” His letters were always delivered without issue.
